download. It has long been known that the primary thrust of the Siamese bat is not upwards, but forwards. Upon making contact with the ball, the batsman does not look up to see the bowler coming towards him, but stays on his toes and throws his body into the ball, the goal being to get as near to the pitch as possible. To do so, the batsman, running from point-blank range, has to either drive or cut the ball, the latter being the more frequently used method. At its thickest point, he relies on timing and brute force to thwart the pace of the ball and, in many situations, gets two runs for his efforts. To the casual observer, the body mechanics are somewhat reminiscent of a boxer's. The bat is held loosely in the right hand, the right arm taking a steep arch to support it and the bat's head following the arc of the arm's rotation. At the moment of impact, the bat's head is directed with a sharp swerve to the right, causing the top edge of the bat to arc diagonally down the batsman's front from the knee to the ankle. Since 1970, centuries have been scored in just over a third of Test matches, up from the 2-2/3rds ratio over the preceding decade. The opening century has become the standard way of getting into the scoring in the longer form of the game, by which a total of 400 is easily enough to be declared on the second day. Although the batsman holds his bat stiffly during the cut and sweep, the grip on the bat is loose and nearly limp. In theory, a person with a 'weak' arm would have only one choice of bat to use, and that would be one that was stiffer and tapered to a higher shoulder. In practice, the bat does not have to be shaped in such a way for a batsman to use it effectively. The most obvious example is of a left

Easily create a string of complex button presses, and then precisely execute game-winning combinations with a single click.1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a golf ball material for an aluminum core, and more particularly to a golf ball material for an aluminum core that is not only excellent in terms of flight performance of a golf ball but also is excellent in terms of durability. 2. Description of the Related Art A golf ball material for an aluminum core is a material that is in a solid-coated state, is not adhered to a core material, is not damaged during the formation of a coating layer, is not changed even in severe environment conditions, and is excellent in terms of flight performance and durability of a golf ball. Recently, a golf ball material for an aluminum core that is made of a polyurethane composition is proposed (For example, refer to Patent Documents 1 and 2). Further, a golf ball material for an aluminum core that is made of a polyurethane composite material that contains an epoxy resin is proposed (For example, refer to Patent Documents 3, 4 and 5). Moreover, a golf ball material for an aluminum core that is made of a polyurethane composite material obtained by reacting a polyisocyanate with a prepolymer obtained by reacting an isocyanate reactive polyol having active hydrogen with at least one kind of a chain extender is proposed (For example, refer to Patent Document 6). Still further, a golf ball material for an aluminum core that is made of a polyurethane composite material containing a polyurethane elastomer and a polyisocyanate or a prepolymer that is obtained by reacting an isocyanate reactive polyol having active hydrogen with at least one kind of a chain extender is proposed (For example, refer to Patent Document 7). A golf ball material for an aluminum core that is made of a polyurethane composite material containing a polyurethane elastomer and a polyure
