SSL LMC-1 Plug-In Listen Mic Compressor VST ^HOT^ Crack

in terms of quality, the lmc-1 is a versatile compressor, as its predecessor the sl4000e, its easy to shape and experiment with, and with a good, experienced engineer behind it, is a perfect tool to make the drums in any mix sound fuller, crisper, punchier, brighter, stronger. there's no doubt that the lmc-1 is a powerful tool, and that's why we feel its probably one of the most used compressors at any level of music production. if you're using it in a mix, it's best to start out with the attack at about 45ms, and then set the release time to around 2050ms or so. that way, the release time is set short enough to allow the compressor to kick in quickly, without compressing the initial transient too much, but long enough to get the signal back down below the threshold, and give the compressor time to recover before the next transient hits. if you're in the habit of using the lmc-1 on its own, try setting the attack to around 45ms and set the release time to around 2050ms. this should give you plenty of time to set the threshold and damping before the next sound hits. or, if you find the release time is affecting the balance of your mix, you can always play with the ratio and threshold to get the sound you want. the sl4000e can be a bit on the harsh side for some mixes, especially if you're adding a compressor to the overall mix after the mastering process, but it's not too hard to tame. the lmc-1 on the other hand is not quite as easy to manage as the sl4000e, so if you're adding it after a mixing process, you should probably start with the same settings as we suggested above, but you can always go back and tinker with it.

a this is a plug-in for the actual lmc-1 compressor. very similar to the lmc-1 used in the ssl sl4000e mastering console, it's very effective for getting the sound you want from the drums. tcr (time-constant ratio) is useful time is set very short, but if you'd rather not mess with the ratio, you can usually achieve the same effect by setting the release time shorter than the attack time.

damping is also useful for getting rid of unwanted harmonics and the like, and if you'd like, you can set a threshold below which the compressor will not kick in, allowing you to control the amount of compression simply by setting the threshold below the level you want to keep. the last knob is used for normalizing, or applying equal amounts of compression to the overall sound, but it's a good idea to set the level where you want it, and the ratio high enough to get enough compression to balance the eq and compression levels.
